The old man is around 68 or 70, and the narrator cannot place whether he has an Italian or Spanish accent, but feels fairly sure that the man is South American. The man complains that the group of American sailors is too loud. One of the American cadets, a boy of about 19 or 20, sits near the old man and offers him a cigarette, but the old man refuses, preferring to smoke a cigar. The young cadet offers to light the man's cigar, and the old man insists that the light will not work.
